

Health Information Online

Searching for health and wellness information on the Internet may seem overwhelming. Here are some tips from the Canadian Public Health Association about how to evaluate health information online:

- When looking for health information online, keep in mind that the internet is not regulated. Anyone can set up a website.
- Does the website say who is responsible for the information and how you can contact them? Look for links that say “about us”, “about this site”, or “contact us.” If you can’t find out who runs the site and how to contact them, you should be suspicious.
- Is the purpose of the website to give information, or is it to trying to sell you something? Commercial websites might be giving only information that supports what they are selling and not a balanced view.
- You can usually get reliable health information from non-profit, educational or medical organizations and government agencies. Health information should be unbiased and balanced, based on solid medical evidence and not just someone’s opinion.
- The most trustworthy health information is based on research. Does the website give references to articles in journals or other sources to back up its health information?
- Health information for the public should be easy to understand. Technical or unfamiliar terms should be clearly explained. Websites should also tell you when the information was prepared and updated.
- Trust your instincts about the health information you find on websites. If it doesn’t seem reasonable and believable, then don’t use it.
